The Garden Of Words

written by the streetlamp

From the time I was really little – maybe just a few months old – words were like sweet, liquid gifts, and I drank them like milk and water. I could almost taste them. They made my jumbled thoughts and feelings have substance.

My parents have always blanketed me with conversation. They chattered and babbled. they verbalised and vocalised.

My father sang to me.

My mother whispered her strength into my ear.

Mother used to say that however miserable one is, there's always something to be thankful for. And each morning, when the sky brightened and light began to flood my cell, I agreed with her.

Our lives are defined by opportunities, even the ones we miss.

When you get older, you understand why your dad works so hard.

Dads get all the bad rap and no praise.

But it's all about the sacrifice, right?

What's with the look? Did I sound cool?

OddlyPoetic was created so you can stay updated whenever we find new helpful techniques and learn whatever little we can about life and in good faith pass it on. I know you have a lot of choices in who you read, so I know I have to earn your trust with every post I make.

I'm a firm believer in "Show, don't tell" because too often we would say anything just to hear what we want – right or wrong. Then we lie to be forgiven.

Don't be that guy.

(Did I just read you Kill Our Way to Heaven, Michl's awesome first track? It's always super nice to see the start of an artist's career.)

"The best books are those that tell you what you know already."

My #2 most favourite author said that. Take a guess.

"George Orwell"

Very good!

Welcome to nerd porn {:-)

Last words you'll ever read here, or the start of something beautiful.

PS : Good luck for your tests! May the odds be ever in your favour! =D>
